

21. The narrator states "for corporations to dominate government, a coup is no longer necessary." Similarly, a former CEO of Goodyear states that, through corporate globalization, "Governments have become powerless compared to what they were before." What makes it so difficult for governments to control the activities of corporations?

22. One person in the film stated the following: "If companies don't do what they should be doing, they'll be punished in the market place." Is this sufficient motivation for businesses to behave morally?

23. One person in the film stated the following: "There are many tools for bringing back community; the importance of litigation, legislation, direct action, education, boycotts, social investment. There are many, many ways to address issues of corporate power. In the final analysis what's really important is the vision. You have to have a better story." What kind of story would motivate people to rise up against corporations?
